Top secret government branch is revealed for the first time to the public, announces that aliens exist and that a rapture will be occurring in 6 months. I think this would be cool to make because I'm a big fan of science fiction and I was specifically "inspired" by a game I recently played called Control. It's about a lady named Jesse Faden becoming the director of a government branch named the "Federal Bureau of Control", who is in charge of containing interdimensional beings and threats, while also keeping the public unaware of the going-ons within the Bureau, and dealing with any so-called "Altered World Events", in which one of the paranormal threats escapes the Bureau and attacks. In the game, the previous director took his own life after being unable to deal with a newly discovered threat, and as Jesse steps in, the headquarters are being overtaken by a paranormal demon virus thing. The building is also infected with mold, and there are evils lurking every hall. I like this game so much and it also involves multimedia things like fake interviews in real life with Jesse, fake advertisements and more. I think making a website that parodies this (obviously not connected to the FBC or 'Control') would be fun. I've also noticed that a lot of government websites look remarkably basic in design, so I think it would be an attainable goal and idea to try and replicate for an assignment (I don't know how legal pretending to be an official government site is).

This fictitious organization would be called the U.S. Department of Dimensional Structure and would have a fake login site that, once entered through, would pose as an internal resource and that it isn't public. There will be a few main sites that are exploreable, and a lot of other links to other "pages", however that's just smoke and mirrors, as every other site will put up a fake error saying something like "Connection Failed" or "Outage Detected" or something. Among these fake links, there will be fake progress reports like "The Meaning of Life Solved!" (dead link), "Employee Guide to Telekinesis" (dead link), "Australia: Is it Real or Not?" (dead link), among other silly headlines meant to draw attention. I think it would be pretty funny if there was a merchandise link that leads to the official White House gift shop site. The main page for aliens will cover when they were discovered as well as their supposed involvement in multiple world events (I'm thinking non-controversial stuff like the invention of the smartphone, or contribution to making flight possible) and then a lot of procedure on how to deal with them and make sure the public remains unaware. There will also be a page detailing an (untested) "last case scenario" on how to combat aliens. This page will be non functional (just to mess with people). I want to make a fake "About Us" page that will talk about fictional world ending scenarios that the Department has supposedly prevented (made to sound obviously fake and really outlandish) as well as records of department operations happening all the way back to the 1300's.

One of the links in the bar at the top detailing all these fake articles, would be one announcing the end of the world, via simultaneous overheating and the earth itself collapsing into a black hole. The website will present this as a good thing, and as an impressive feat of collaboration between the Department of Dimensional Structure and the aforementioned aliens. The site will feature survival tips for all employees, but those will be blacked out intentionally.